

How can screening improve youth mental health across the nation?

The United States youth mental health crisis is impacting citizens ages 5-24. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) research shows that:

One in five adolescents ages 13-18 currently has or at some point has had a seriously debilitating mental illness.

In 2021, suicide was the second-leading cause of death for adolescents ages 10-14 and the third-leading cause of death for adolescents ages 15-19.

Ages 15-19

Suicide rates for people ages 10-24 have been increasing exponentially since 2007.

Ages 12-17

Mental health-based emergency room visits have increased by 24% for children ages 5-11 and by more than 31% for adolescents ages 12-17 since the beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Early intervention, including mental health screenings across states and schools, can result in improved long-term mental health outcomes.

Screenings help identify issues early, so youth who are at risk for or who currently have a mental health illness can better manage and heal from their condition(s) with support from family members and community resources.

Learn more about how our experienced, multidisciplinary team of management consultants and licensed health care providers can provide early mental health intervention through youth mental health screening services.

Why is one of our most vulnerable population's mental health frequently overlooked?

Young people who don't feel well physically typically are encouraged to see a doctor for appropriate care. So why isn't it natural to encourage young people who don't feel well mentally to do the same?

Because youth mental health screening is not readily available.

Our team can help you access the mental health screening services our youth so desperately needs.
